RESEARCH INTERESTS

Human and nonhuman animals are dynamic creatures, constantly striving to behave adaptively in an ever-changing environment. I study some of the mechanisms by which an animal might learn and remember complex information, especially that which is organized spatially or temporally.

Additionally, my earlier research investigated the effect of (high-fat) diet on hippocampal-dependent learning and memory. This issue still interests me, although is no longer manifested in my empirical work.

My experimental design and general empirical approach benefit from training in learning theory—using classical, operant, and instrumental conditioning paradigms to investigate complex processes.

Keywords: time, sequences, learning, memory, context, reward, motivation, diet, feeding, ingestive behaviors

stereotaxic survival brain craniotomy and surgery in rats (cannula implantation, excitotoxic lesions), systemic (intra-peritoneal and sub-cutaneous) injections and intra-cranial infusions (without anesthesia), behavioral tracking, data acquisition, statistical analysis, intra-cardial perfusions, histological (microtome) sectioning, microscopy (light and confocal), Nissl staining, immunohistochemistry (Fos in coronal sections)
